The Expedition's Goals

The Lewis and Clark Expedition was commissioned by President Thomas Jefferson in 1804 to explore the Louisiana Purchase and find a water route to the Pacific Ocean. The expedition was led by Meriwether Lewis and William Clark, and it included a diverse group of soldiers, scientists, and frontiersmen.

The expedition set out from St. Louis, Missouri, in May 1804. The group traveled up the Missouri River and then overland to the Pacific Ocean.

They reached the Pacific Ocean in November 1805, and they spent the winter there.

The Division of the Expedition

In March 1806, Lewis and Clark decided to divide the expedition into two groups. Lewis would lead one group to the Pacific Ocean, and Clark would lead the other group to the headwaters of the Missouri River. The two groups were to meet up again at the mouth of the Yellowstone River in August 1806.

Lewis's group traveled down the Columbia River to the Pacific Ocean. They reached the ocean in November 1805, and they spent the winter there. Clark's group traveled up the Missouri River to the headwaters of the river. They reached the headwaters of the river in August 1806.

The Return Journey

The two groups were reunited in August 1806, and they began their return journey to St. Louis. The return journey was fraught with danger. The group encountered hostile Native American tribes, and they were forced to navigate treacherous rivers and mountains.

The expedition finally reached St. Louis in September 1806. The expedition had traveled over 8,000 miles, and it had explored a vast new territory. The expedition's journals and maps provided valuable information about the West, and they helped to shape the course of American history.
